extensive analyses were performed using the GSTABL7 program along with. STEDwin for Windows.. Figure 14.1 Some of the default inputs. The ballot issue that voters here in San Diego will have to consider to raise the amount that the city spends on elections from $11.2 million to $18.7 million is the same one that's on California's ballot this November. It was proposed in 2008 to bring back in-person voting for San Diego elections. In-person voting has been eliminated because the cost of printing and transporting thousands of ballots to polling places is costly and the likelihood of voter confusion and fraud is a concern. Called "Proposition A," the ballot issue would require a two-thirds vote to raise the $10.5 million to $11.2 million in new city money needed to print, transport, store and distribute 643,000 ballots. A survey of San Diego residents conducted by the San Diego Foundation in 2005 found that 60 percent of respondents favored the return of in-person voting. Voting machines also are in favor of bringing back in-person voting. Voter sentiment polls conducted by the American Society of Training and Development in 2002 and 2004 found that 83 percent and 85 percent, respectively, of voters considered voting by machine to be an important part of fair and democratic elections. But Michael Schroeder, president of the San Diego County Elections Coalition, said the election could easily cost voters and elections officials some $28 million. Schroeder said these are tough times for local governments in San Diego County. “This is an election time for the city of San Diego. It’s for all the commissioners, for all of the city councilmembers,” Schroeder said. “They have to keep a very tight watch on money, because that money is really the supply of a lot of services to residents. And the voters expect city government to function efficiently and cost-effectively.” Schroeder said there are so many variables in the election and ballot-measure that will make it difficult to project how much the election will cost if Proposition A is defeated or passed. “It’s not easy to put together projections based on an issue that isn’t a typical of a city election,” Schroeder said. Schroeder said moving from an in-person voting election to a vote
